WHEREAS, Based on the work of the Subcommittee on Victims and Co-victims, including the February 2020 hearing, the Council of the City of Philadelphia finds that:

- (1) A broad array of government and government-funded agencies that serve victims, as well as co-victims, who are individuals that are substantially and adversely but indirectly affected by acts of violence and other crimes;
- (2) That network of agencies constitutes a substantial pool of resources for victims and co-victims, but there is no single agency with a mandate to undertake coordination and planning for the provision of victim services;
- (3) In addition to service providers, a number of other government and government-funded agencies regularly interact with victims and co-victims, but there is no systematic coordination with service providers or training on trauma-informed practices;
- (4) Victims are not consistently and uniformly notified of their rights and the public generally is underinformed as to the rights of victims;
- (5) There is no independent entity charged with investigating complaints regarding victims' services and evaluating the efficacy and efficiency of the system as a whole;
- (6) Prompt, effective responses to acts of violence—including investigation, mediation, and other interventions, can prevent further violence from occurring;
- (7) The Pennsylvania Office of the Victim Advocate has proven effective in assisting victims in navigating complex legal and administrative processes, promoting better police and practice, and advocating for victims' interests generally;
